George Dulin, a colored coal, miner, of Crofton, was killed in the Nortonville Coal Company's mine yesterday morning by falling slate. The negro went into a condemned section of the mine, although, it is said, the mine boss had warned him of the danger of working in that portion of the mine. Fellow miners heard the falling slate, and when they went to where Dulin had been at work they found his dead body, badly crushed.

He was about 25 or 30 years old and was raised near Crofton. He had been at work in the mine several months.

It is a matter of common knowledge that when a husband and wife have lived together for a long period they not only acquire the same tricks of voice and manner, but they show a strong facal resemblance, so that they, might easily be taken for bother and sister. Almost every one has at least one such instance among his acquaintances. But it is amperhaps a less well known fact that is similar resemblance often results from a mistress and servant being associated together for a long period of years. Added to the fact of constant nearness, there is usually on the part of the sagesons. perhaps a less well known fact that a similar resemblance of the results associated together for a long period of years. Added to the fact of contant nearness, there is usually on the part of the servant a desire to imitate the voice and manner of the instress she so much admires. And this often extends to the facial resemblance. There are in a small provincial town in New England two most unusual instances of this resemblance. Two maiden ladies like there, each of whom has been attended for the greater part of fifty years by a woman who is more a companion than a servant. In both cases the women have become so autosishingly like their mistresses that they are often mistaken for them. And their voices over the telephone are so exactly like that the friends of both ladies have given up this means of communication with the because of the embarrassing mistakes which constantly resulted from it.
